City Encounter Table

By Matthew J. Finch

Introduction

Not much introduction's needed here, other than to mention that the city portrayed here is strongly slanted toward a swords & sorcery feel, and it's designed to provide adventure possibilities rather than accurate demographics or historical reality. The presentation of the encounters isn't standardized – the encounters read like a quick notation. This is done deliberately, so the game master can assimilate the encounter quickly at the gaming table. If you're generating three or four encounters per street on a large table, you'll need to be working fast, so a sparse description works better than a dissertation. Many of the entries refer to light, heavy, and elite guards; the armor and weapons of these guard categories are described in the Notes, below. Also, spell capabilities of non-player characters don't necessarily match the player-character capabilities of a particular class, which is also deliberate – these are not player-characters. Presumably, very few readers insist that the monsters and NPCs of a game must follow precise formulae without deviation. Take these tables, make them your own, and "imagine the hell out of it!"

Notes

- Roll encounters with whatever frequency makes sense for the way you're game mastering the city. Three to four encounters per street, rolled all at once, provides a colorful set of options for the characters to interact with. Alternatively, you might decide that these encounters occur once per street or area, with all other encounters being basically standard city people.
- Armor class is noted for descending AC and also for ascending AC, which is in [brackets].
- Every encounter has a 25% chance that there are 1d4 beggars nearby as well.
- Light guards have ring mail and shield (AC 5[14]), with a spear or a short bow (1d6 hp).
- Heavy guards have chain mail and shield (AC 4[15]) with sword or longbow (1d6+1 hp).
- Elite guards have plate mail and shield (AC 2[17]) with sword or longbow (1d6+2 hp).

Non-Player Characters

Quick-generators for NPC Personalities

Note that you can get some interesting results if you use this table for monsters from time to time. “Friendly” zombies might actually form up and escort the party. “Distracted” stirges might be found already feeding: a grisly discovery. One might definitely hope for a “Tolerant” vampire!

These tables are much shorter than they could be, but short tables make for quick resolution at the gaming table.
